In our session we will be going over our 2 best selling products, LibrarySite and LibraryDAMS. LibrarySite is a hosted and fully-managed package designed to serve libraries with modest budgets and limited or no technical staff. It comes with unlimited support through our ticketing system. It is the best way for a library with a limited budget to launch a website with specific functionality designed for what libraries need. The LibrarySite package includes sitebuilding, training, our library of problem-solving videos, and support. Libraries can choose the standard LibrarySite template for their website or choose to customize it.

LibraryDAMS is our hosted, managed and supported Digital Asset Management System for libraries. Built with Islandora Fedora Repository and Drupal, LibraryDAMS gives librarians a friendly interface to manage digital collections of images, documents, audio files, and more for visitors from around the world.

Counting Opinions

ROAR (Report Once and Automatically Reuse). Libraries are increasingly asked to be accountable and to regularly provide data to multiple stakeholders inside and outside their local operations. Very often the combinations of these requests are composed of identical, similar and/or unique requests for data. Often these submissions are handled individually resulting in repetitive compilation, inconsistent and/or inaccurate values being reported. Considering the totality of these data requests, libraries can embark upon and enable a methodology that overcomes the many repetitive steps in compiling data for these various stakeholders and realize a more accurate, efficient and effective workflow for all persons involved in the library's data capture and reporting processes. This session will instruct participants on how to manage and streamline the many data requests to satisfy all stakeholder requirements. This session will be of keen interest to libraries and staff persons that compile and submit data to multiple stakeholder including municipal, state, national and/or private library data surveys.

Patron Outcomes. Thanks to the great work of PLA's Project Outcome, public libraries and soon academic libraries (through ACRL) are capturing immediate outcome data to bolster their advocacy efforts. While these immediate outcome surveys are also invaluable as a feedback mechanism for evaluation and program improvements they only scratch the surface of getting at real tangible outcomes that are measured by actual changes in behaviour, status and/or condition of the individuals who use the services of the library. Managing the capture of outcomes, including follow-on outcomes measurement, is a lot more complex and time consuming for staff -- and thus often not done at all or only very infrequently. As a result, if and when available, libraries have to rely on outside sources of data and lay claim thereto in whole or in part-- often with great difficulty and scepticism, as to the libraries actual contribution. Going beyond capturing immediate/subjective outcomes (program exit surveys), find out how libraries can easily augment the process to capture real outcomes from the perspective of actual users of library services.

Immersive media creation in libraries is evolving. Over the last six months we ran workshops creating interactive virtual worlds with students using 360 degree cameras and software. Stop by and see a showcase of their work and how to use these workshops in your programming. Augmented Reality (AR) is growing with both Apple and Google releasing powerful programming tools for the creation of augmented reality apps. The potential to make interesting engaging apps for use in the library is exciting. Imagine Shakespeare appearing off the shelf to pitch Romeo and Juliet, or being able to see the stacks come alive with characters from books. AR can change how libraries serve customers and train employees. AR can also be used to create engaging patron-facing applications that can bring new patrons in and connect them with information they would not have typically sought out.
